2. Short Poem, First Place

Fifty Years Later

he remembers the jacket, smell of the leather the way the fringe hung off the sleeves; remembers the apartment in the Haight district, Jefferson Airplane posters on the walls, over-sized pillows on the floor thrift shop sofa singed with cigarette burns; how they cringed at middle class values, unhinged the bedroom door, hung long strings of beads that clicked together, caught morning light
how they binged on soda crackers, peanut butter, cheap wine, on quiet evenings
the girl sang as she played her mandolin.
